Online Drug Addiction Help Now Being Provided At State Level

An online resource well versed in the subject of drug addiction has recently released a state-by-state drug addiction list in which to help drug addicts find addiction help.

/24-7PressRelease/ - May 09, 2008 - A respected resource in drug addiction, DrugAddiction.net, has recently provided support to give Internet users access to drug addiction help based on the state they live in.

Previously, Internet users had to try their luck at search engines and drug addiction help lines to get help in finding resources near them that they can try out. No longer is the process a bait and tackle luck of the draw- as DrugAddiction.net has arduously put the pieces of the puzzle together for consumers.

The resource has reported that consumers and drug addicts seeking help have had a warm welcome to the new addition on their website. Competitors have noted the change in reliability, functionality, and ease of use- and their lacking resources have thus become less valuable to those seeking drug addiction help.

It is expected that DrugAddiction.net will continue their free resource to the general public, and keep their services running so that consumers who are in need of drug addiction help will have a place to turn to, without the hassle of sifting through hours worth of information to find reliable information.

About DrugAddiction.net:

DrugAddiction.net was created in order to give drug addicts a way to find out more information in which to better help themselves find help and aid. They are a free resource that periodically expands their information base to keep up with the latest in drug addiction treatments.
