Open Plan Offices Get More from Planted Office Displays

Planted office displays that serve an active purpose as office dividers and aesthetic screens.

STAFFORD, UK, October 05, 2008 /24-7PressRelease/ -- Fosters Breathing Space is offering UK businesses a viable green alternative to improve the look and feel of open plan office buildings; office plants and planted office displays. Many facilities and building managers find that they need to utilize office space differently than was originally intended using a room divider or screen. It may be, for instance, that a supervisor requires more privacy from the employees under their supervision but there is no separate office available.

The most common reason for requiring the separation of smaller areas of a large office however is the need to allow multiple activities between employees to occur with minimum disruption to one another.

The screens usually incorporated in these circumstances however are often ugly and can spoil the look of a contemporary office space.

Office plants can be used to not only add a bit of colour to the workspace but if carefully planned can also be used to create beautiful green room dividers and noise barriers between busy desk clusters.

Daniel Foster, Managing Director of the leading office plant maintenance provider said;

"Office plants have many benefits and in the case of clients who have large open plan offices we can provide planted office displays that both look good yet serve a practical purpose. For instance, some large offices can get very loud when in use and office plants have been proven to help reduce noise in office buildings."

He continued;

"Over the years we have also found that many facilities managers have requested planted office displays that can be used to help separate and divide desk clusters from different departments. The introduction of office plants in these circumstances not only helps to minimise noise but also contributes to the health and general well being of employees."

With office space in built up areas becoming more expensive and much harder to find, making efficient use of the space you have is certain to be a more economical and practical solution, what's more with office plants you can add a bit of life and colour too!
